Course description: Close readings and analysis of U.S. Literature from the mid-19th century onward will be conducted with particular attention to its participation in discourses of national formation as the United States expands and becomes a global imperial power. How national literature participates in managing the racial tensions and linguistic and cultural definitions of the United States (notice I avoid the name “America”) will be a major question we will ask throughout the course. Other questions we will consider are: What is national literature and should literature be defined by the limits of a nation? How does the deemed body of national literature, or canon, change over time and how has it been radically reconsidered in the past two decades? What is the effect of studying “major” and “minor” authors? Does literature trace the histories of social movements and developments, such as women’s rights, civil rights, labor struggle, gay rights, English language imposition, immigrant and environmental activism? How do writers confront and negotiate with the state and with law in particular, over such issues?

Text: The Norton Anthology of American Literature, volumes C, D and E in one package, available at La Tertulia bookstore near campus. Please bring readings to class.

Attendance and Punctuality: More than three absences will result in the lowering of final grade by at least one. In the case of having three absences excused by medical or sports notes, then any one additional absence will similarly affect your grade. Grades will also be lowered by repeated tardiness.

Participation: Asking questions or making useful comments will strengthen your grade. However, those with shy personalities will not be penalized, and those for whom it is easier to speak publicly should be conscious of giving others a chance.
Papers: One five page paper, due at midterm, and to be revised and resubmitted before the class ends. Outside research of at least one source for the first paper, and two sources for the second version will be required. I will pass out guidelines as the dates approach.

Exams: A take home midterm and final will consist of short identifications and an essay.

Quizzes: Two mid-level quizzes of identifications will also be held.

Teaching Strategies: class meetings will consist of analytical discussion of reading assignments, and conceptual understanding of related issues. At least one film will be screened and visual aids pertaining to the issues and works will be used.
